INTRODUCTION

If you have read much about nursing or have had contacts with nurses recently, you know that a great many more registered nurses are urgently needed to care for patients in our nation's hospitals, nursing homes, and other health agencies. Factors that have helped to bring about this need are well known: increased population, scientific and technological advances, more health insurance programs, and growth and expansion of hospitals and other health facilities. It is a fact that while you are reading this paragraph, new job opportunities are being created and the need for more registered nurses is increasing.

It is also a fact that nurses are privileged in a number of ways besides always being assured of a job. Their work is endlessly interesting, both in itself and in that it keeps them in constant contact with people of every description; they are valued by society; and their work gives them a sense of personal worth, the inner satisfaction that comes out of helping people.

Preparation for nursing is available in a variety of educational settings, one of which is the community college that offers an associate degree program in nursing. This pamphlet gives general information about associate degree preparation for nursing; lists all institutions that offer state-approved programs of this type; indicates those that have been accredited by the National League for Nursing, which is the national accrediting agency for nursing education programs; and presents certain specific information about the nursing program offered by each institution listed.

ASSOCIATE DEGREE PROGRAMS IN NURSING

Although this type of program is relatively new, the first having been instituted in 1952, it has multiplied rapidly and is now proliferating at a rate faster than that of any other type of nursing program.

Although there are variations, a number of features are basic to associate degree programs:

- The majority are conducted and controlled by public junior or community colleges, some are in senior colleges or universities, some are in technical institutes, and a few are in private institutions.
- The programs vary in length from two academic years to two calendar years.
- The program of study combines nursing courses and supportive college courses.
- Students must meet requirements of the college to be admitted to the nursing program.
- Costs and living arrangements for nursing students are comparable to those for students in other curriculums in the college. The costs are usually minimal for local students.
- The associate degree nursing program prepares students to be eligible to write the state licensure examination to become registered nurses.

The last feature is especially important to note, for within the field of nursing today there are many kinds of nurses with different types of education and equally different job responsibilities. Despite this variety, however, the majority of registered nurses work in hospitals or other institutions and are engaged in giving direct nursing care to the sick. These nurses are usually called general duty or staff nurses and sometimes "bedside" nurses. Since staff nurses give direct care to patients, they must possess a high degree of technical nursing knowledge and skill and have an understanding of the scientific principles of the nursing care they give.

An associate degree program will meet your needs if:

- You would like to give direct nursing care to the sick.
- Your goal is to become a registered nurse.
- You want both a nursing education and some college-level general education.
- You want to complete your education in a relatively short period of time.
- You would like to have a college degree.
- You would like to obtain your nursing education in a college in your own community.

The unique features of associate degree education for nursing also mean that the programs are attractive to married women and others whose family responsibilities require them to live at home, to men who wish to pursue nursing careers, and to older students.

Although the associate degree program in nursing is complete for the purpose described, some of the college credits earned in the program can be applied toward a baccalaureate degree in nursing should a graduate decide later to pursue education for professional nursing. The amount of credit granted will depend on the policies of the senior college or university that offers the particular baccalaureate degree program.

Admission Requirements

High school graduation or a high school equivalency certificate is the minimum requirement for admission to an associate degree program in nursing. A school may establish any requirements it wishes above the minimum. A good academic average is desirable. Since admission requirements vary, you should obtain specific information by writing to schools for their catalogs or bulletins.

Licensure

All states regulate by law the practice of nursing and other health occupations. Licensure, therefore, has a legal meaning. A license is not a degree.

A graduate of a state-approved associate degree program in nursing is eligible to take the state licensure examination to become a registered nurse. Licensure as a registered nurse (R.N.) means that the nurse has met legal requirements to practice in the state in which the license is issued.

To become a licensed nursing practitioner—an R.N.—you must be a graduate of a state-approved school or program in nursing. State-approved schools have met legal standards set by a state board of nursing. This applies in each of the 50 states.

The protection of the public is the basic reason for licensing laws, since the public cannot be expected to know the difference between a competent or an incompetent practitioner. In terms of public safety, a licensed practitioner of nursing, a registered nurse, is assumed to be a safe practitioner. Note especially that a registered nurse's license does not indicate the type of education the nurse has had, since the R.N. may be a graduate of an associate degree, baccalaureate degree, or diploma program in nursing.

Nationally Accredited Schools

Before a program in nursing can be opened, it must establish that it meets the legal requirements set by the state. In addition, there is a professionally oriented approval, or accreditation, sought by many programs. This type of approval is national in scope and voluntary rather than required by law. The standards set by the accrediting body are uniform throughout the United States. The recognized agency for the accreditation of programs in nursing is the National League for Nursing. The achievement of NLN accreditation by a program signifies that it has met the national standards of excellence for programs in nursing of its type.

Scholarships

If you are going to need financial assistance, write to the college of your choice for a listing of available scholarship funds.

STATE-APPROVED ASSOCIATE DEGREE PROGRAMS

Listed on the following pages are the institutions that offer state-approved programs in nursing education leading to an associate degree and specific information about each program. The information was supplied by the programs in response to a questionnaire distributed by the Department of Associate Degree Programs of the National League for Nursing. As in all publications of this kind, the information is subject to change.

The names of institutions offering programs accredited by the National League for Nursing are printed in boldface type. Almost all of the programs are coeducational; the few exceptions are noted in column 1 below the name and address of the particular college.

The name and title of the nurse administrator who is responsible for the management of the program appears in column 2. The approximate length of the program is indicated in column 3.

If you have already taken some advanced high school or college courses or have had some education in nursing, check column 4 to learn whether or not advanced placement is possible at the college in which you are interested. If it is possible, write to the college for information about placement examinations or other evaluation procedures and to request an evaluation. The granting of advanced standing is the prerogative of the school, and each school sets its own criteria for the evaluation of work done at other schools.

If you cannot afford to study full time, columns 5 and 6 will tell you whether the college permits part-time study during the day or has evening division classes.

Column 7 indicates whether dormitory residence is required or available to students who do not live at home in the community or living arrangements must be made by the students.

In order to help you plan realistically for your preparation, estimated costs for the total program are shown in column 8. Community college tuition costs are for local students. These colleges have other cost schedules for out-of-town residents of the state and for out-of-state students. Private colleges have the same costs for all students. The figures shown should not be interpreted as complete costs. The school catalog will give a more detailed picture of the costs. If you select a college outside your community, you must plan for room and board in addition to tuition and fees. As costs rise, these figures will become out of date.

Column 9 shows the maximum number of freshmen admitted to the program each year. Many of the community colleges admit on the basis of "first come, first served." When the number of qualified applicants reaches the capacity of the program, no more are admitted. Therefore, it is to your advantage to apply early.

Column 10 tells you the person or office to write to for an application form, a catalog, or other information about the college and the nursing program.

This publication was designed to provide preliminary guidance in the selection of a program. Study the information given about each of the programs in the state or area in which you wish to obtain your preparation, select two or three programs that seem to suit your needs, and write to each for a catalog or bulletin. Then study and compare the programs. The school catalogs or bulletins are the only source of all the information you will need in order to make a final selection.
