INTRODUCTION

The ads above illustrate modern nursing's most critical need: greater numbers of qualified teachers, clinical specialists, supervisors, and administrators. To qualify for these leadership positions by today's standards requires graduate education in nursing. For the professional nurse, masters education is the route to opportunities in modern nursing. To the public, masters education means the availability of better nursing care when and where it is needed. More nurses with graduate preparation will assure quality in programs of nursing education and will safeguard quality of nursing services in the institutions and agencies where nursing care is given.

This publication was prepared by NLN's Department of Baccalaureate and Higher Degree Programs to encourage and assist prospective candidates for masters study. It will be a useful reference for educators, for students enrolled in graduate programs, and for all who wish to motivate more nurses to seek masters preparation and thus to foster the continued development and improvement of nursing education and nursing services.

This publication gives general information about masters education in nursing, offers suggestions for choosing a program, and includes a list of colleges and universities offering masters degree programs that have been accredited by the National League for Nursing (NLN). NLN is the national accrediting agency for professional nursing education.

EDUCATIONAL OPPORTUNITIES

PROFESSIONAL NURSING EDUCATION: UNDERGRADUATE—GRADUATE

Better nursing service for the public is the goal of professional nursing education

Undergraduate programs are offered in senior colleges and universities and lead to the baccalaureate, or first professional, degree in nursing. Graduates of NLN-accredited baccalaureate programs:

• are eligible to become licensed as registered nurses;*

are prepared for beginning general practice of professional nursing in hospital and public health nursing services and all other institutions and agencies where nursing care is given;

 have the educational background that is required for advanced professional, or graduate, education in nursing at the masters level.

Graduate education in nursing prepares for specialization. Most graduate study is offered at the masters level, although graduate education in nursing also includes doctoral programs.

To be eligible for masters study, a nurse should complete a baccalaureate program with an upper-division major in nursing. Masters education builds on this foundation—an undergraduate college education with a nursing major.

*Licensure as a registered nurse (R.N.) indicates that a nurse has met legal standards to practice nursing in the state in which the license is issued.

MASTERS EDUCATION—SPECIALIZED STUDY

The purpose of masters education is to prepare professional nursing leaders. These are the clinical specialists, teachers, supervisors, and administrators whose special knowledge and skills are required now and will continue to be in the future to meet our nation's nursing needs.

Masters education is distinguished by concentrated study of a specific area of nursing, introduction to research methods, and independent study of a nursing problem, using research techniques. The latter may be called a masters study, project, or thesis.

Most NLN-accredited masters programs combine study of a clinical area, such as maternal and child nursing, medical-surgical nursing, psychiatric nursing, or public health nursing, with study of a functional activity, such as teaching, supervision, administration, or consultation. Although nursing is the major focus of the program, masters education also includes advanced courses in the natural and social sciences relevant to the area of specialization. Other subjects appropriate to graduate education may also be required.

CHOOSING A MASTERS PROGRAM

The variety of curriculums offered in NLN-accredited masters programs reflects the wide range of opportunities in modern nursing. Admission requirements, length of program, costs, and organization of curriculums vary with individual institutions.

Selecting the right program is essential! Among the factors you should consider are:

Size and location.—One way to expand your nursing horizons and your knowledge is to attend a graduate school of a different size or in a different location than that in which you obtained your undergraduate education.

Emphasis on a clinical specialty.—There are varying degrees of emphasis on the clinical specialties within NLN-accredited masters programs. The primary role of the clinical specialist is that of expert practitioner giving direct care to patients who present the most complex nursing problems. Today's clinical specialist in nursing may also function in such roles as teacher, consultant, director, or coordinator. Check individual curriculums regarding the courses and learning experiences they provide that relate to these roles. For example, if teaching is your goal, check to be sure that the curriculum provides strong preparation in the clinical specialty you would like to teach as well as in the function of teaching. (NLN-accredited baccalaureate programs seek faculty members with this type of masters preparation.)

Financial assistance for masters study.—There are a number of sources to consult if you need financial assistance. First, get information from the college or university you plan to attend. Then explore other possible sources of help or information, such as state governmental agencies (e.g., board of nursing, department of health, department of education), state or local nursing organizations, state or local voluntary health and welfare organizations and agencies, veterans' organizations, and similar groups. Your bank is a source of information about bank loans for educational purposes.

Your interests and career goals.—Ultimately, your interests and your career goals will determine your choice. Ask questions of yourself and the school: Does the program offer opportunity for further professional and personal development? Can you pursue special interests? If you are considering still further education, does it build a foundation for doctoral study?

For specific information about any NLN-accredited program, write to the dean or director for a catalog or bulletin. The names of deans and directors to whom inquiries should be addressed are given in column 1 of the list of NLN-accredited masters programs, which begins on page 4.

Compare the course offerings of several programs. Review curriculums and program objectives in relation to your long-range goals. If possible, visit programs to discuss your plans and your questions. If you are a student in an undergraduate program, discuss your plans and your questions with your faculty adviser. After careful and thorough exploration, select the program that best meets your interests and your goals and make application at the time required by the school.

AN EYE ON THE FUTURE-DOCTORAL STUDY

As you look into the opportunities for masters preparation in nursing, you should also keep an eye on the future and consider the possibility of doctoral study. Two types of doctoral programs for professional nurses are currently available. In one type, nursing is the major field of study; in the other, an area in the physical, biological, social, or behavioral sciences is the major field of study. Although NLN does not accredit doctoral programs, NLN will, on request, supply a list of the universities that offer both types of doctoral preparation.

MASTERS PROGRAMS IN NURSING ACCREDITED BY THE NATIONAL LEAGUE FOR NURSING

Listed on the following pages are the colleges and universities that offer masters programs accredited by the National League for Nursing. General information about the programs and their curriculum offerings is given. The information was obtained from the schools. As in any publication of this type, the information given is subject to change. For further information about any program, write to the nursing dean or director for a catalog or bulletin.

Please note the following:

1. Definition of practicum—In columns 3 and 4 of the school list, the term "practicum" means planned, guided learning experiences involving the exploration of theory in a clinical setting through observation, participation, and/or research. Some programs use the term "laboratory."

- 2. Making up of educational deficiencies—Although admission requirements vary, the majority of NLN-accredited masters programs require completion of a baccalaureate program in nursing. If your baccalaureate education does not meet the admission requirements of the program of your choice, ask the school about ways in which prerequisites can be met.
- 3. Up-to-date lists of NLN-accredited programs—The complete list of NLN-accredited baccalaureate and masters programs appears annually in the June issue of Nursing Outlook; a supplementary list is published annually in the January or February issue. (Nursing Outlook is the official magazine of the National League for Nursing.)

Explanation of Information Given in Columns 1 Through 6 of the School List

Column 1—Gives:

The name and address of the institution offering the masters program.

The legal control of the institution (in parenthesis).

The name and the title of the nursing dean or director.

Five facts about the masters program:

- 1. Admission requirements.
 - a. Baccalaureate preparation required.
 - b. Experience required, if any.
 - c. Tests that applicants to the masters program are required to take.
 - d. Licensure requirements.
- 2. Whether a thesis, project, or study is required for the masters degree.
- 3. Housing—whether dormitories are available; whether married-student housing is available.
- 4. Whether part-time study is possible; period of full-time study required, if any.
- 5. Times at which students are admitted to masters study.

Column 2—Lists curriculums offered in each masters program.

Column 3—Indicates whether a clinical practicum is required (req.) or optional (opt.).

Column 4.—Indicates whether a functional practicum is required (req.) or optional (opt.).

Column 5—Specifies the usual length of each curriculum for the average full-time student (by semesters, trimesters, quarters, and summer sessions, according to the calendar system on which the institution operates).

Column 6—Specifies the approximate total cost in dollars of required tuition and fees to the average full-time student (does not include costs for such items as room and board, books, and supplies).
